SEPERATION

Rouletting, (from the French roulette) is done by passing a small wheel, simular to the wheel of a spur, over the paper, each point of the wheel causing a slit or cut to be made in the paper. With this method no paper is removed, and the cuts may be wholly or partly through the paper; the cuts varying in size according to the width of the point of the roulette. Should the points of the roulette not be in a straight line, it is certain that the cuts will not correspond, giving rise to a number of varieties of rouletting, which in general are known by their French terms.

Rouletted, or rouletted in lines, French, perce en lignes: German, in linien duchstocken. In this form of rouletting the paper receives small cuts in straight lines and the guage of the roulette is determined by the number of these cuts to two centimeters.

Rouletting in colored lines. When rouletted stamps are printed from electrotypes, an ordinary printers rule is used between the stamps. The rule stands higher than the electrotypes, the edge is sharp and devided in short spaces or lines, in the process of printing the rule receives the ink and with the impression cuts through or partly through the paper, and in so doing imprints the color in the cuts.

Pin perforated, French, perce en points; German, in punken duchstocken. In this method the holes are pricked through the paper but no paper is removed, therefor it can hardly be termed perforating
